Usher

Lauren Odell Usher combines our everyday lives with everyday materials. Toilet paper, Ziploc bags, and pizza boxes - things you normally find in the recycle bin - have been taken to another level in an installation about day-to-day life and human connection. The project began with self portraits taken first thing in the morning and developed into a participatory work involving 16 other individuals.

By combining linoleum prints of people first thing in the morning with materials she uses on a daily basis, Lauren Odell Usher has visually written her philosophy about the world we all share. In this world every individual and every moment of their lives is significant. Learn more about her work at <http://www.laurenusher.com>.
